This shit is so funny dude

A common occurrence I keep seeing is people getting stuck in certain times, as in they keep using the same rhetoric without evolving with the conversation. The typical offenders you're probably acquainted with are conservatives that still think we're in 2016, but there's also a huge amount of lefties that think it's still 2008. The list goes on. This isn't meant to be me complaining about random people holding beliefs that are passé, it just pays to actually know where we are at this point. "Know your enemy & know yourself" & whatnot.

For our own purposes, we're just going to split the sides of US politics into Right/Left & AltRight/AltLeft. Nothing more specific matters when looking at the grand scheme. The mainstream elements of both sides are considered the ones that actively hold power in their respective institutions, most notably the Democratic & Republican parties. The alternative factions are the elements that exert influence over the mainstream even if not directly empowered. This is the hordes of retards that whine on Xwitter all day, à la the 'dissident right.'

Fortunately, it's mostly been good things on the Right. Boomer Conservatism, which has been the prevailing ideology for decades, is dying quickly. This is because boomers themselves are dying, in the more literal sense. In retrospect, this was inevitable. Regardless of how inauthentic national politics are, it's still made up of human beings with finite lifespans. Ideologues & their target audience will eventually fall victim to the only promise left unbroken. A lot of the issues that used to plague the old political discourse will simply disappear as the conversation increasingly hinges on Gen Z & Millennials, along with the topics important to them.

Much to the chagrin (& often confusion) of the older generations, the youth doesn't actually care about defending our greatest ally or even small government. The entire Evangelical movement, which was arguably the most important demographic for the Republican voting base, will likely be extinct within 20 years. Praise be. Their replacements are increasingly more ecologically, racially & culturally aware. This process will only continue.

The Right circa 2025 is best encapsulated by JD Vance. Not perfect, but a massive improvement over the previous generations. Aside from Vance himself, the vast majority of younger staffers in the GOP fall into this crowd as well. These types are more in line with the online RW, most are familiar with figures like BAP, Curtis Yarvin, Richard Spencer & the rest of the AltRight/Dissident Right rogues gallery. It's also not uncommon to see more esoteric (& importantly, illiberal) historical thinkers, one of the more common being Evola. As I've written about previously, the old AltRight left a lasting impact that's only becoming more pronounced over time.

I won't bother touching on the "principled conservatives," à la James Lindsey, because I don't see them gaining any more influence other than becoming laughing stocks.

The more dangerous faction is what the illustrious Will Martin refers to as Tech Niggers, Thiel, Musk, etc. Despite both being very useful for the overall RW, the whole faction is very much not friendly to our goals. Musk's repeated drug fueled crashouts are testament enough, Thiel is a homosexual. Both figures, & similar types, seem to be latched on to the political movement primarily to advance their own interests. Musk failed because he's painfully autistic with an awful ability to read the room, fortunately for us he squandered whatever influence he gained in the past few years.

Thiel is more dangerous because he does not have autism & clearly very capable as an oligarch. He is also deeply connected to the "deep state" as a technology contractor. This is a double edged sword, it's far better for his ilk to be in control of the Leviathan than what we've had to deal with previously. Regardless, there's still the inherent danger as he is only a circumstantial ally. The massive shift towards focusing on deportations & leftist political violence gives us ample breathing room, however.

The Tech Niggers are all advancing their own interests, but some are doing so in more reliable ways. Musk showed that he's willing to abandon The Movement™ when it gets in the way of him importing his Indian code monkeys. Thiel, on the other hand, advances his interest by loyalty. He already did this when developing Palantir, which now dominates the software of the entire US government & military, by being reliable. I infer that he's trying to occupy a similar position to Steve Bannon or Stephen Miller, a trusted ally of Trump. Being a trusted advisor to the king is a famously good long term investment.

Probably the most important development is that the institutional RW is now well aware that it's deeply reliant on the AltRight. When something pops up that's wildly unpopular, it often gets rectified. A good example is the HIB argument that Musk brought up a few months back, as well as the public land selloff that Mike Lee was pushing. If it's causing a stir on RW twitter, the Vice President will see it. This takes time to bear fruit, but just know it signals the death of the old guard & their impending replacement.

Finally, we're steadily seeing the rise of an energetic RW. One that actually wants to win & change things. The only issue is that the AltRight is still a menagerie of mutually exclusive ideologies. For the most part, this can be split into two camps. The first is the progressive types, such as BAP. The other is the trad types, like most Christian influencers. All of these are easily unified in their opposition to the Left, but it will be an issue in the long term when we have to figure out who's in charge.

I don't know how often you guys peer into lefty discourse, but there's been a rough civil war going on there since the election. Leftism doesn't really have a ton of ideological diversity, but there's a distinct gap between 'Liberals' & 'Leftists' amongst themselves. They're not different enough to really make a difference from our position, but liberals are more akin to what you might expect from a Minnesota suburb while leftists are the dysgenic freaks that are pervasive on Reddit & Twitter. Think Barack Obama vs Hasan Piker.

Essentially the liberals are mad that overdoing all the woke nonsense cost them the election while the lefties are purty spiraling. Much like the old guard conservatives in our camp, the liberals are a dying breed. The immediate future of the American Left looks increasingly less like Tim Walz & more like Zohran Mamdani or Destiny. The most recent DNC shows that the most hardline elements are firmly in control.

This is good & bad for us. The bad is that it makes any lefty victory much worse, they will be more fanatical in their actions & attempts to destroy us. The good news is that it's much easier to foster an 'Us vs Them' mentality (friend-enemy distinction will become increasingly apparent in the coming years), which helps with recruiting. The more honest they are about hating Whites & such, the easier it is to rally people against them. It's important to remember that all leftoid victories are built around endless moralagagotry, not the actual end goals themselves. Defeating the Left is done by either debasing their moralism or showing what the outcome is.

I do not wish to make it seem like the Left is routed, as some on Twitter have. They're certainly on the back foot for the first time in about 60 years, but this doesn't mean they're somehow out of the fight. The liberal factions are digging their heels in, trying to do everything possible to harass the current admin, while the leftists are doubling down on everything.

As for the future, the worst case scenario is that this is the calm before the storm. It's highly possible that Trump, or Vance '28, is the last Republican presidency. The victory margin was not that high & we're still outnumbered. Going along racial lines alone will end in our defeat. As well, Trump being vaguely proactive has opened a can of worms that cannot be closed. By going after the power base behind the Left, the bureaucracy & institutions like USAid or universities, he has essentially made the RW an existential threat. For all their kvetching, RW governments are almost universally worthless at combating the Left as they're completely unwilling to actually go against long standing laws, institutions, etc. Trump doing this, as well as taking aim at elements of the constitution & even the Civil Rights Act, changes things. This gives the Left every reason to do anything they can to prevent any chance of a RW government, the most notable tactic being flooding the country with non-White migrants who inevitably vote Dem.

The best scenario, as in the only way forward, is if the Machiavellians of the administration get their way. Barring anything crazy happening, I doubt that Trump will emerge as a Caesar type figure to smoke out the government. What's more likely is an increasing reliance on simply defeating the Left by any means necessary. Trump's recent threats to deport Musk & Mamdani, while funny, are a great (& unprecedented) example. The only thing that matters at this point is consolidating power as much as possible. At least until tensions finally hit their breaking point.

On that note, the militant perspective. In my opinion, any open conflict that breaks out in the next few years will most likely take the form of a Trump aligned faction going against leftoid "resistance." A horde of wannabe Luigi's & street takeover à la the Floyd or LA riots. If things do boil over, our side will most likely take the form of government agencies & contractors. Lefties on Twitter have brought up a few times recently that Trump is turning ICE into his own secret police by expanding its budget over 20x. They are correct, he learned this in 2020 when using federal officers from loyal agencies (ICE, Border Patrol, etc.) to put down the riots. The fact that he jumped straight to using the Marine Corps as a show of force this time means he learned something from the experience.

This doesn't necessarily mean that DHS agents & a revived Blackwater are going to burn through Seattle like the Marines burned through Fallujah, but it does give a good idea of what trends are developing. As I brought up in previous articles, certain actions by the administration are actually very damaging to the Left. They will respond. As of now it's still random trannies & retards, but this won't last forever. Eventually, it will inevitably attract more capable individuals like Timothy McVeigh or Luigi Mangione who are capable of causing a lot of damage or at least taking out an HVT. The recent killings of Dem politicians in Minnesota show that it was never really that difficult to at least take out a couple, even for a retarded boomer. What happens when ex-military types, or anyone else with a noteworthy combat background, start using the same tactics they used in Afghanistan in the streets of NYC?

For what it's worth, I would recommend joining the general RW in this hypothetical conflict. Whine about Israel all you want, if people are dragging libtards into unmarked vans & sending them to Rwanda, & you're not one of them, you're doing something wrong.

For a historical example, this situation can be seen as roughly parallel to the Sparticist Uprising in Germany. Trade out Freikorps for ICE or Blackwater. Considering what else happened in Germany a bit later, I'm content with this.

In any event, ride the tiger & roll with the punches.

Good things happening, this administration is superior to his last and will hopefully continue on this path. My only concern is he's doing too little too late regarding the Chinese, there should be a full on ban of their nationals from entering the U.S. or Europe.
